The Builtas - A Lifetime On The Ranch

By Elizabeth Cowley

Angie Acevedo (now Angie Builta) was brought from Arizona to Rancho San Carlos when she was six months old. Angie's father was a cow boss, bringing cattle from Arizona to Rancho San Carlos for Arthur Oppenheimer who owned Rancho San Carlos until 1990. When he arrived he decided to stay and brought his family out a few weeks later. Angie has lived at Rancho San Carlos ever since.

Angie met her husband, Ron Builta, at the ranch in 1970. Ron was competing on the Rodeo Circuit and got a temporary job (or so he thought) as a ranch hand at Rancho San Carlos on his way to Cody Wyoming for a bull riding competition. Although Angie stood Ron up on their first date she decided to give him a try because "He could ride and was a good cattleman - all the things that I liked." Ron decided to stay and he and Angie have been married for 25 years.

Angie and Ron still live in the old ranch house which was built in the 1940's. In Angie's youth the ranch house also served as the school room. At the time, none of the women at the ranch could drive the children to school in town so they started their own and were taught by Jane King, now Jane Staker.

Angie has worked at Rancho San Carlos her whole life helping with branding and doctoring the cattle and horses. Currently Angie is the Manager of the Equestrian Center. The Equestrian Center was built in the 1920's and while Ron has converted some of the old stalls into a tack room, they plan to keep the original building intact. She administers the horse's shots herself and keeps each horse well exercised.

Ron Builta is the Foreman for Rancho San Carlos and is in charge of maintaining the seasonal cattle grazing and ranch operations - quite a task on a 20,000 acre ranch. Mr. Oppenheimer sold his full-time cattle in 1983 but Rancho San Carlos has continued a seasonal cattle operation by leasing the land for grazing.

Oppenheimer gave Angie and her brother their first horse, Eddie, when she was three and a half years old. Angie has competed in the Carmel Valley Rancher Days competitions since its inception 14 years ago but was unable to compete this year due to a broken tailbone obtained from an unfortunate kick from a horse. Ron Builta competed in this year's Carmel Valley Ranchers Days calf branding and team pinning competitions and placed second in team roping. Setting the standard for the next generation in the ranching family, six year old Amy Cline, Angie's niece, won the silver buckle for the stickhorse race in this year's Ranchers Days.

Oppenheimer sold Rancho San Carlos in 1990 and the new owners development plan includes 350 homes, a golf course, and a 150 room hotel. The Monterey County Board of Supervisors approved the continuation of grazing at Rancho San Carlos allowing between one and two thousand head of cattle to graze at the ranch between February and July. Ron said the number of cattle and grazing time will depend on the availability of grass in desired grazing areas. Ron said "Rancho San Carlos will always have cattle and maintain the historical value of the ranch, reduce fire danger, and augment the native perennial grass program by grazing off the annual grasses. By doing this we will not over-graze and will have good ground cover for the winter rains which helps minimize erosion."

Angie said she has seen a lot of positive changes at Rancho San Carlos over the past six months. Of the proposed project Angie said "It is a tremendous project for the community - it will open up new jobs for local people. I will still live and work here and Rancho San Carlos will always have cattle and horses. I back them up 100%."

BROWN RECLUSE SPIDERS

More poisonous than the vaunted Black Widow spider; as deadly as a young rattlesnake; the innocuous Brown Recluse can maim or kill a dog, cat, small livestock or human.

According to the County Health Department and the state's Poison Control Center, there are no Brown Recluse spiders in Monterey County.

Yet, staff at the Community Hospital of the Monterey Peninsula's emergency department report treating 10 to 12 people each year for the symptoms of bites by these small, quiet, brown spiders, that prefer to reside in warm dark areas of barns, garages, homes and forests.

The Brown Recluse, as the name suggests, tends to stay away from light and open areas, saving its major poisonous bites for defensive situations.

A bite from any of several species of the Brown Recluse, also commonly known as the violin spider, produces a large, circular, red to purple flat welt with an irregularly shaped blister on top of the welt.

According to the University of Kansas' Department of Entomology, the severity of the bite may vary. In mild cases the bite may cause only some necrosis - a disintegration of the skin. Slightly more severe cases may cause pain and oozing of the infected areas.

Moving up the ladder of severity, the dose of poison may be great enough to require surgery to excise the poisoned flesh and muscle.

Large doses of the poison from the Brown Recluse can allow sufficient infection to require the amputation of limbs, with the potential to destroy body tissue like gangrene. Should the poison reach major organs or the central nervous system, the bite may be fatal.

The Brown Recluse at maturity measures a scant 3/8" in length; with short, sturdy, hairy legs; and what appears to be a closely cropped suit of brown hair. On its back, the spider shows a barely visible, yet distinctive, hourglass or violin shaped black marking measuring about 1/8".

Monterey Bay Pest Control says that while resistant to pesticides, the Brown Recluse can be exterminated.

While local physicians are generally unfamiliar with the treatment of Brown Recluse bites; Midwestern and Eastern physicians, where the spiders are more common, advise that immediate treatment is vital and can substantially reduce the overall danger. There seems to be some agreement that early treatment with large doses of antibiotics, followed by steroids, oral or injected, can reduce the potential harm and shorten the period of pain.

YOUR WORLD AND MINE
Araby Colton

Joan Baez used to sing a song about God being on our side. I think the point of the song was that we do some pretty terrible things while claiming God is in our end of the court.

I think, perhaps, the point should really be are we on God's side?

We all know the arguments for preserving nature ... that the rainforests hide undiscovered medicines, that genetic diversity is crucial to maintaining robust, disease resistant crops, that animals will likely provide cures for everything from my neuritis to someone else's high blood pressure.

All this can be called the utilitarian argument for preserving the environment, that the world is there for us to use as we see fit.

But there's another way of looking at this thing, and that's the notion of stewardship, the sense that this is God's world, and we are here as his stewards, to use it wisely, but above all to care for it.

The Evangelical Environmental Network (EEN) is a three year old movement growing out of 1000 Christian congregations nationwide. It recently made its voice heard loud and clear when it held a press conference with Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt, and some Congressional leaders.

Focus of the group's attention was the preservation and strengthening of the Endangered Species Act, which the group regards as a modern Noah's Ark.

Says Stan LeQuire, Director of EEN: "In addition to the overwhelming political and economic reasons to support the ESA there are biblical reasons as well. We declared that the earth is the Lord's, and that preserving 'God's gorgeous garden' is a fundamental responsibility of all who call themselves believers."

The message has been well received, with hundreds of news stories and media inquiries. EEN leaders have been interviewed by radio, tv, and print journalists.

Secretary Babbitt issued a statement saying that the group was "extending our ethical obligations not only to our fellow humans ... but to the land and water and forests and plants and animals that live from our Creator."

Said Sue Verner, of Smyrna, Georgia, in Washington to lobby her congressman, Speaker Newt Gingrich, "I've always felt that we take advantage of animals because they can't stop us. I think it's time we stop ourselves."

Said Reverend Jim Bell, a Ph.D. candidate at Drew University, "As Christians we desire to live in a country where people take care of all of God's creatures, where the rich diversity that God created is protected, and where the life God intends for them to live is allowed to give glory to the Creator by its wonderful existence."

As he spoke, Maverick, a 120 pound cougar from the Columbus Ohio Zoo, whose cousins in the animal world are endangered, cavorted playfully for the cameras.

WHAT'S NEXT? Mel Vercoe

A news report states that three out of four Americans approve of Pres. Clinton's military strikes against Iraq. I am not among the approval group, for several reasons.

Our original problem with Iraq started as this one did, during a presidential election period. Our State Dept., through Amb. April Glaspie, gave Saddam Hussein erroneous signals to let him believe that the U.S. would not be concerned about his intentions. He then did what we expected him to do, and we had a nice little war under way to help a U.S. president get re-elected. Everything worked perfectly, except for our winning the war in just four days, and it was over too soon to help in the election.

U.S. presidential elections should not have to include deceptive tactics, the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, for example, or another president's claim to have a fool-proof plan to end the Viet Nam war, which resulted in prolonging that senseless conflict long enough to cause the deaths of an additional 20,000 U.S. military personnel. The Irag-Saddam Hussein problem, on the other side of the planet from the U.S., had been accepted as a legitimate United Nations' problem by everybody but our White House. Quite clearly, our President Clinton, with a lot of great do-gooder ideas, has gotten the idea that the Pres. of the U.S. job includes the Emperor of the World job. Granted, the World needs an Emperor, but the U.S. can't afford all of the expenses and warfare required for the job.

Our Congress won't go into the history books as much of a Congress, but the original idea of wars having to be declared by Congress should be brought back before this uncontrolled War Powers Act winds up getting us into two or three World Wars at the same time. Even without any more wars we are rapidly approaching national bankruptcy, with a greater indebtedness than all other nations combined. That will mean a quick drop into Third World Nation status, a pitiful end for a great country that had everything going for it, except common sense.

Crowd's Favorite Didn't Win Carmel Valley Ranchers Days Queen Contest

Editor, Carmel Valley Sun:

While our valley's little Ranchers' Days Queen contest does not have the worldwide watching of the Miss Universe contest, it still brings out a pretty large group of Carmel Valley residents to watch. Such was the case with this year's contest. Over the past few years I myself have enjoyed watching the horsemanship, personality and appearance and the original poems and short stories the girls write and read for us. Most years it is a toss up as to who has won.

This year one young lady exhibited such poise, grace and personality she soon became the crowd's favorite. While most of the girls read their poem, this girl presented her beautiful poem about what a cowgirl is from memory without a flaw. It brought tears to my eyes as it did to several other people standing near me. Since there was some time to kill from the end of the competition until the announcing of the winner I decided to tell this young lady what an outstanding job she had done.

I found I was not alone and several other people were congratulating her as well. There was not a doubt in anybody's mind that had watched all three phases of the contest who had won it. But to my and most people's amazement she received first runner-up, not Queen, when the winners were announced. This is to take nothing away from the young lady who won, however she just didn't do the job the other girl had done.

I decided to speak with this girl again to let her now that I still thought she had done an exceptional job and should have won. Well, lo and behold, I had to wait in line to tell her. I must have heard a dozen or more people tell her that she should have won the contest. She handled the situation with grace but you could tell she too was surprised and a little upset by the outcome.

On Saturday and Sunday I attended Ranchers' Days and was continually reminded of what I and many others feel was an injustice in the judging. There was even talk that one of the judges was surprised when the announcement was made. I personally would like to find out why the crowd overwhelmingly felt that one young lady had won and the results showed differently. Perhaps someone on the paper can look into this. All five of the contestants deserve to be judged fairly without prejudice or bias. Frankly, it made me wonder a time or two if whoever is hitting the stop watch on the timed events is doing so fairly.

Tattered Flag a Disgrace

Editor, Carmel Valley Sun:

Am I the only one appalled by the condition of the flag - Old Glory - hanging above the Village Market? It is neither glorious nor proudly waving.

Faded, tattered, torn, wrapped around its stanchion - a symbol of long neglect - it is an insult to our flag and a disgrace to our community.

It looks like some pitiful old rag.

I don't know who is responsible for the care, the maintenance of flags above the shops, but please can't something be done about this? Either don't hang a flag at all or replace this one and give it the care and respect it deserves.

Ranchers Days a Charity Event - Proud of Queen

Editor, Carmel Valley Sun:

Many people in our community do not realize that Carmel Valley Ranchers' Days is a charity event. We do not keep any of the proceeds but return it to different causes in the community: 4-H clubs, community centers, Fire Departments, schools and this year we will have a scholarship for a graduating Carmel High student.

In the past 3 years that we have been on the committee we have seen Ranchers' Days grow to include many children's events, women's events and events where adults and children participate together. The weekend has become a family affair.

We are very proud of our Queen event and especially for the young ladies that spent many dedicated hours in preparation for this contest. To all

COMPUTER TALK

Val Healey

Part 27 - An introduction to computers at a naively simple level

In addition to the communications-protocol settings discussed in the last part for serial information transfers between two computers, it is also necessary to set what are known as error protocols. These are sophisticated means of ensuring that the data transmitted are error free. Such protocols have names like: Kermit, Xmodem, Ymodem and variants on these such as Xmodem/1k, Xmodem/crc, etc. etc. It is not necessary to know very much about these because, most do a pretty good job, but the important thing is to choose the same protocol for both computers. For connecting to mainframe computers, Kermit is probably the best; for pcs, Zmodem is usually the most reliable, in particular when telephone line often drops - something we will discuss later. There is not much difference between the others.

The next factor to be considered is the "flow control" which is a predetermined setting whose aim is to ensure that the two computers know how to control the flow of data. For example, at a given point in time, one computer may send a little faster than the other can receive so it needs to be told to go for a cuppa something until the other catches up. In most cases here there are two settings: X-on/X-off, which is software control, and hardware control. Almost all modern modems and communications programs use hardware control so, unless there is some information to the contrary, this should be used as the initial setting. It is sometimes necessary to try a few settings to get the best communications between two computers.

There is usually a terminal emulation setting that allows one to force the system to behave like a particular terminal such as the VT100, which is a very well known standard introduced originally by the Digital Equipment Company (DEC). Other less used settings are TTY, which emulates the now antiquated teletype machines, and VT52, which is another DEC standard. Usually the default setting is VT100 and it can be left that way.

There is yet one other choice when transferring data, which is the choice of way to send a file - either as a text transfer or a binary transfer. Only a text file may be sent as a text file but any file, whether text, graphic, executable file, etc. may be sent as a binary. Choosing a binary transfer usually restricts the choices of the other protocols mentioned above.

All of the settings mentioned so far are made in the communications program that controls the transfer. For most people this program will be one that has been supplied with the modem, or fax/modem, as it is often called. More sophisticated communications programs can be bought separately for about $50-$100 and usually these perform better and have many more bells and whistles.

The next factor to be considered is the rate of transfer of data. As we have already mentioned numerous times, the amount of storage space required for a file is expressed in kilobits, megabits, etc. The transfer rates for modems are usually given in kilobits per second or, for very high speed transfers on LANs, etc., in megabits/second. An older word here for bits/second is the "baud" rate, where one baud is one bit/second. However, it is not advisable to use this word anymore because the precise meaning of the original word could mean several bits/second today.

Stepping onto the treadmill at our local fitness center, I can select a running pace or a walk. Running is more stressful, but in 10 minutes it burns off as many calories as I could burn in 45 minutes at a walk. Considering "time" against "calories-burned", my compromise is to run 6 minutes and walk 14 minutes. The mix is interesting and at that pace I'm willing to go back another day, which improves my chances of corporeal downsizing.

Stepping into the stock market also presents the choice between running and walking. It is human nature to invest when the market is at running speed ... when others seem to be making fortunes, we are tempted to give it a try. It is also human nature to quit the market when stocks drop. At running speed, stocks which go up quickly also tend to drop quickly. Statistics favor investors who can stay in the market at running speed, but at that pace most of us quit when we lose. The risks of investing at a running speed are not tolerable for most of us, and the rewards which may arise from investing at a walk are not attractive enough.

The answer, as true for investing as it is true for exercising, is to find a compromise pace. For investors, one way to go about this is to select assets from several different classes: stocks which move at running speed and bonds which move at a walk, stocks of foreign companies, real estate companies, oil companies and so on. The object is to arrive at a formula which represents our personal compromise between risk tolerance and reward expectations. The result is diversity across several asset classes.

And not just any old diversity; we want diversity among assets which have little or no correlation between one and another. We want one class of our assets to rise if another class loses value in response to market change. A mix of asset classes showing low correlation may produce better results for the same level of risk, or the same results at lower risk, than a mix of assets which are closely related. Mathematicians who model the markets have proven to their own satisfaction that diversified portfolios designed for low correlation between several asset classes can significantly improve rewards compared to the risks involved, over time. Combining diversity and low correlation to moderate the pace and stress of investing may bring results good enough to keep us from quitting.

The final step toward investment fitness involves balancing. If we invest according to a formula for diversity and low correlation among asset classes, market changes will cause some to swell and others to shrink as time goes by. To keep faith with our formula we must shift values periodically, to restore the original balance.

Exercising or investing, the secret is to adjust pace and stress to the point where any of us who begins will stay with the program, until finally the belt size or wealth occurs. For either pursuit, once we punch the "start" button the rest is a matter of discipline and time. I'm interested in this ... are you?
